Located at 138 W. Lincoln Avenue is a two- and one-half-story gabled ell Queen Anne-style dwelling. The sign on the house says it was built ca. 1875 but the present appearance is more indicative of a ca. 1895 date. The house has a central hipped roof with projecting gable bays of asphalt shingles, a central interior brick chimney, a foundation of stone and the exterior has a narrow weatherboard siding. On the main (S) elevation is a partial-width, shed roof porch with milled wood posts and railing and a wood floor. The main entrance retains an original, single-light glass and wood door with a simple wood cornice and surround. Above the doors are rectangular panels in a swag design. Windows in the dwelling are original, one-over-one double hung wood sash design with simple wood cornice surrounds. A large picture window on the first floor of the main elevation has a multi-light transom. On the dwelling's east elevation is a bay window on the first floor level with the central window having a multi-light transom. Gable fields on the west and east elevations have decorative shingles and a single attic window. In the gable fields of the main façade are original decorative wood shingles and two, single-light fixed windows. A decorative milled vergeboard is at the gable eave. Milled brackets, similar to the vergeboard design, are on the porch. On the west elevation is an original, single-story, partial-width entry porch with a hipped roof supported by milled posts and railings with milled brackets.

To the rear of the dwelling is a ca. 1925 garage with a front gable asphalt shingle roof, a weatherboard exterior, an exterior end brick chimney and ca. 1990 overhead track metal panel garage door. Contributing
