

201 W. Station Street – Contributing

Located at 201 W. Station Street is the James Creet House. This side-gabled Colonial Revival dwelling was originally more likely a Folk house, built prior to 1853 and moved to the southwest corner of Cook and Station Streets around 1857. The building was moved to its present location in 1917 and was remodeled into its present Colonial Revival form ca. 1940. The original partial-width porch on the main façade has been removed and replaced with a small gabled enclosed entry bay. The house has a gable asphalt shingle roof, a continuous rock-faced concrete block foundation, a ca. 1940, interior brick chimney and an exterior of masonite siding. On the main (N) elevation is a ca. 1940, enclosed gable roof entry bay with a ca. 1940, wood panel door beneath a four-light transom. On the east and west elevations of the entry bay are circular, nine-light sectioned wood windows. The first floor of the main façade has a large bay window with a central, thirty-six light glass and wood window flanked by four-over-four double hung wood sash windows and a wood base. The other windows in the dwelling are eight-over-eight double hung wood sash and date to the 1940s. On the rear of the dwelling is an original, single-story, frame wing.

On the east elevation of the dwelling is a one-story attached garage built ca. 1940. It has a flat roof, an exterior of masonite siding and a six-light and eighteen-wood panel glass and wood overhead track garage door on the north elevation.
